"Mr. Coolidge was not especially interested in social or economic questions. He was most reluctant to take any action in advance of the actual explosion of trouble in those sectors. One of his sayings was, 'If you see 10 troubles coming down the road you can be sure that nine will run into the ditch before they reach you and you will have to battle only one."

Young folks of this generation look on Mr. Hoover as a conservative. But 30 years ago he was hailed as a great liberal. The true conservative was President Coolidge -and Hoover's Memoirs tell the story just as newspapermen remember it in the day-by-day head-

Coolidge was correct in saying that of the 10 troubles coming down the road only one would probably reach a President. But even that 10th one, he failed to see.

Hoover reports that the Republican cabinet under Coolidge, of which he was a member, voiced alarm over the run-away speculation of the late 1920s. But Coolidge considered it beyond the realm of political action and refused to take a hand. The buildup under Coolidge developed a crash just as Hoover was taking office - and ruined Republican prestige for all the years since. The Memoirs make interesting and thoughtful reading.

If Coolidge discounted the wolves coming down the nation's highways perhaps today's government exaggerates them, running forward with a weapon to fight each and every
